HISTORY ESSAY

Charles Jencks in his book "The Language of Post-Modern Architecture" shows various similarities architecture shares with language, reflecting about the semantic roles of architecture and wanting to communicate architecture to a broader public. The book differentiates post-modern architecture from architectural modernism in terms of cultural and architectural history by transferring the term post-modernism from the study of literature to architecture.

Jencks briefly explains post-modern aesthetics from their modernist predecessor in the death of modernism's death, writing "tragically, we can date the death of the precise moment in time... Modern Architecture died in St. Louis, Missouri, on p.m. (or thereabouts)." (23) Unlike Jencks, literary scholars talk about the famous representations of modernism, but they completely avoid postmodern movement. Due to architecture's visual character and Jencks' early, self-learned, intertextually read scholarship, the differences between modern and post-modern aesthetics are often clearer in architecture than in literature. Architecture provides a helpful visual counterpart for modern and post-modern aesthetics in literature. According to him, architectural post-modernism favors pluralism, complexity, double coding, and historical contextualism.

Jencks believes "the glass-and-steel box has become the single most used form in Modern Architecture and it signifies throughout the world 'office building'" (27). Thus, modern architecture is essential in terms of form, in other words it is designed around one out of a few basic values using a limited number of materials and right angles. In contrast to modernist architecture, post-modernism is characterized by double coding, the inclusion of messages to be understood by the building's users and inhabitants and a separate set of messages to be understood by other professional architects.

Often, post-modern double coding is ironic. For example, AT&T Building in New York City looks both like a traditional glass and steel skyscraper and at the same time like the crest of an old grandfather clock or Victorian bedpost. This form gave the building its 'Chippendale' nickname, thus, it is double-coded. It's facade is left-right reversible, includes a lot of 90° angles, it's ground level includes pillars, and there's a simple capital in the top horizontal row of windows. By reflecting and distorting many of the other modernist buildings in its vicinity, this building does not have a problem blending in. However, the AT&T building's pink granite covering provides a glaring ironic break from the dull colours of its neighbor's neighbors. The building also includes the broken Chippendale pediment, a second capital on top of the modernist one, which not only breaks the modernist flat-roof code but also ironically suggests a grandfather clock, certainly the biggest one in the city. While many large buildings significantly feature clocks, for example Big Ben in London, it is unquestionably ironic that a building should take the form of a clock. Its double coding is ironic.
